Freedom for an Instant

—The Rabble's Fury

—United in Death.

When Enrique and Zoraya tried to enter the church the monks who had observed their approach quickly ranged themselves in ifront of the church door, so as to effectually bar the entrance.

"My daughter! I wish to save my child!" urged Padilla. "Do you wish to owe her devil?" asked Molina.

'She is now in his grasp. I wish her restored to me," urged the governor. "It affects the safety of your soul; it

Zoraya now breathed upon her forehead, and speaking to her with much authority, said:

"Awake! I command you!"

Juana slowly, and with apparent difficulty, opened her eyes.

"Arise!" commanded Zoraya,

Then, with Zoraya's assistance, Juana raised herself, placed her feet to the ground and stood up.

The spectators were filled with wonder and bewilderment, and, in their ignorance, they freely attributed Zoraya's feat to the power of witcheraft.

They said to each other: "She is surely a sorceress!"

As to Juana she looked about her in surprise and exclaimed:

"Where am I? " Ah! the Moorish woman! " Fatoum! " "

Padilla rose from his knees and ran down the steps, exclaiming: sisters! "Juana!"
"My father!" she cried as she fell into his arms.

The excitement among the spectators new found utterance in loud and varied exclamations. Some of them cried out: "A miracle!"

"Silence, people!" shouted Calabagas; "there is no such thing as a miracle of the devil."
"Come-let us thank God!" said the

"Come-let us thank God!" said the governor. He delivered Juana to the gare of the nuns, who conducted their charge into the Cathedral. Padilla then turned to Zoraya and said:
"Depart in peace, Zoraya. All of you-let the Moorish woman pass! She is free! Rimiro, watch over her and her house!"

let the Moorish woman pass: She is free! Rimiro, watch over her and her house!"

Fadilia, accompanied by the four quisitors, entered the church. The organ was playing the Te Deum.

Don Enrique lingered upon the portido of the church to exchange a farewen look with Zoraya, who was slowly making her way through the crowd of people, who fell back to let her pass.

Apparently the resentment of the rabble toward Zoraya had subsided, and she would leave the square unmolested. But she had proceeded only a short distance when she was confronted by the monks who had taken part in the funeral procession.

Now they barred her passage and crted aloud to the beopla;

"Christians! Shall we let this daughter of Satan go free?"

"No! No!" shouted the mob, aroused once more to active hostility.

The motiks advanced to selze Zoraya, but she quickly retreated toward the church and in an instant Don Enriquestood between her and her pursuers.

"Away with you! Let the woman pass!" cried Enrique.

"No! No! Death to the sorceress!" shouted the monks.

"Peath to the sorceress!" echoed the rabble.

Encouraged by the monks, the mob rabble.

Encouraged by the monks, the mob became bolder and surrounded Zoraya and Enrique in a threatening manner, forcing them gradually back toward the church.

Enrique drew his sword, and, waving it aloft, cried out:

"Stand back, you cowardly wretchest"
